A WINTER DAY
a fox and a robin, smelling the white,
walking along an invisible path, curious,
and intoxicated by the beauty of a perfect and timeless winter day.

"He began to whimper with fear. 'What sort of thing - what do you mean? I thought you said there was no danger?'

'I don't know what it is,' answered Fiver wretchedly. 'There isn't any danger here, at this moment. But it's coming - it's coming. Oh, Hazel, look! The field! It's covered with blood!'

'Don't be silly, it's only the light of the sunset. Fiver, come on, don't talk like this, you're frightening me!'

Five sat trembling and crying among the nettles as Hazel tried to reassure him [...].

"Suddenly the noise sounded again, nearer: and now there could be no mistake. What they heard was the voice of a rabbit, but changed out of all recognition. It might have come from the cold spaces of the dark sky outside, so unearthly and desolate was the sound. At first there was only a wailing. Then, distinct and beyond mistaking, they heard - they all heard - words."

'O Frith,' thought Hazel, turning his head for a moment to the bright glow in the west, 'are you sending us to live among the clouds? [...]' At this moment he saw Dandelion, who had run well ahead, squatting on an ant-hill clear against the sky. Alarmed, he dashed forward. 'Dandelion, get down!' He said. 'Why are you sitting up there?' 'Because I can see,' replied Dandelion, with a kind of excited joy. 'Come and look! You can see the whole world.'
